Not illustrated. 1813 Excerpt: .They were pruned of every unnecessary epithet, in order that its luxuriance being repressed, the language might become more vigorous and expressive. The character of his style was exquisitely wrought and polished up to the perfection Of ideal beauty. It were no wonder, therefore, if we scarcely discern the lineaments of a family resemblance in the works which we purpose to compare with Junius, allowing they were all the acknowledged productions of the same mind. There is another reason why the author, whoever he were, would, as far as possible, remove all resemblance between the style of Junius and his other works. He would justly fear that the internal evidence which all compositions, by the same hand, afford of their common origin, especially to those who are accustomed to regard the nicer distinctions in phraseology, would be r an obvious means of discovering that secret, on the concealment of which he thought even his Jife depended. Under this impression, if he were sensible of any peculiarities, it would be the constant object of his solicitude to remove them. And if the principal writer were himself unable to detect the varieties of phrase which distinguished his productions, he had in the present jnstance an able coadjutor, whose critical sagacity would no doubt be unceasingly, and in general successfully exerted to point them out. This is at least probable, according to the view we have taken of the compound character of Junius. Thus carefully guarded from peculiar words...
